The Dropping of Petals examines the relationship of land with language, working in the space between materiality and semiosis to explore the tension between 'lore' and 'law'. The texts and images convey this in a merging of concrete and concept. They challenge whether lore — knowledge of the land, grown from our relationship with it — is less folk lore and myth, and more the ecological, muddy reality of it, than the black letter law of the land.

Jacob Rollinson's sharp and hilarious debut novella draws on classic Stephen King and popular horror fiction. Interwoven with scrappy drafts of academic thought, the story of Sam's short stay at the ultra-religious Sassenach family home rapidly tailspins into ruminations on identity politics and flights of grotesque fantasy. How will Sam redeem himself in the eyes of his activist cousin? Can he hide a coke comedown from his unsuspecting relatives? Will he ever manage to finish his essay on Stephen King...?

The English Funerals is a collection of ten-line prose poems which embody an exploration of 'epic' verse and instantiate epic themes: the crossing of water, the consultation of oracles, descents into under- or otherworlds; the presence of miraculous beasts, and the immanence of death. Each short text allusively or explicitly contains three such themes and they are presented in a variety of voices — some old, some contemporary.

To see clearly what I am seeing you must dilute the blue you are seeing with the sweat of yellow. You must thin it like spit on the tongue, the tip before transparency. You must taste the salt of the sea, the salt of yellow. Your lungs must be navy and the walls of your mouth green.

like thespians from a long-lost performance, playing over the choppy waves.
